A Patriot is Born

Edward crouched in the shadows behind the Thompsons' barn. He'd been brushing his hair in his own family's barn when he saw a pack of Redcoats. They slipped onto his neighbor's porch and walked straight into his barn. What were British soldiers doing in Mr. Thompson's barn? Edward had been suspicious of Mr. Thompson before. Just the other night while Edward's mother brought to the table, his father was talking about him.

"He's up to something, Grace," he had said. "I can feel it in my bones, so we'd better keep an eye on Mr. Thompson."

Edward had decided to do as his father had suggested. But he wasn't just going to keep his ears open, he was going to keep his ears open, too. As he got closer, the British soldiers' voices flooded Mr. Thompson's barn.

"We'll circle around the perimeter of town tomorrow morning and catch them," one of them said.

"Then, we'll be in position to cut off supplies of all goods if they're coming in or going out," another said. "It's a good plan."

"The only thing that will stop them is a rebellion on the part of the people."

A Dene Legend of the Seasons

When people and animals first roamed Earth, winter stretched on for all twelve months of the year. Huge layers of ice and snow blanketed most of the land. It was impossible for anything to flourish. No water flowed because lakes and rivers were frozen. The people and animals were cold, and they didn't think they could survive much longer.

One icy day day, the first people were out hunting. They discovered a large bear with a sack around neck.

"What is in that sack?" one of the hunters asked the bear.

"It is packed with summer warmth and bright sunlight," the bear g

The people instantly craved what was in that sack. Exposing the w and light could mean an end to the freezing conditions on Earth. "Let us t
