Describe Story Elements

I thought about going to the park when I noticed my best friend Perry's eyes were getting bigger and bigger. "What? I was just thinking about what we should do after school," I asked, feeling very confused.

"I know," said Perry, "there is a thought bubble above your head." Perry sounded frightened.

Just then, the not-so-nice girl in Mrs. Allison's class came pushing her way through Perry and me. I thought about how much I did not like her. She turned back, read my speech bubble and shouted in a very shocked voice, "That is so rude! How could you say, I mean think, that about me?" I knew then that the thought bubble above my head was going to be big trouble.

Why did the narrator say the thought bubble would be big trouble at the end of the story?

Everyone would know what she was thinking.

The thought bubble was getting very heavy.

She wanted a speech bubble too.

She was trapped in a comic book.

Main Idea and Details

Everybody knows the Pledge of Allegiance, but did you know that people cannot be forced to say it? Before 1943, some laws required people to recite the pledge. When two grade school students named Marie and Gathie Barnett refused to participate, they were expelled from school. They brought the case to the Supreme Court, who ruled that people cannot be forced to say the pledge. The court announced its decision on Flag Day in 1943.
